The members of the jury which Wednesday pronounced Morris, the highwayman, guilty of murder in the first degree, must feel very strange and isolated among Utah's murder trial juries of other days—not so many days away, either.

The custom of convicting a man of murder simply because he killed one or two citizens while trying to hold them up, was becoming quite passe in Utah. The juries seemed to feel that Warden Pratt's milk-fed chickens and new potatoes in cream for thirty or forty years, with a chance now and then to stick a knife in a guard or slam a crowbar at a fellow prisoner, was sufficient punishment for the man-killers. In the cloud of squeamish pleas for mercy for convicted murderers by Utah juries and the cluster of killers now at the penitentiary on the east bench, the action of the Morris jury in condemning that fiend to death is pretty nearly the one ray of light justice in this state has had in two years. It was nice to postpone his sentence, and really the man ought to be given two or three more trials on the ground that the stenographer who drew up the indictment against him used a pale blue instead of a lavender colored ribbon on her machine, or some other technicality, and by that time he can probably convince a jury the murder was an accident anyway.
